I think both Charleston and Mexico are great options.

For me, there aren't good timings leaving Miami --> Charleston on Friday. So I would arrive on Saturday at 4pm and Return on Monday at 2pm. That would give us almost 2 days, 2 nights. Do you think that's enough time?

I am going to spend some time tonight looking to see if things will be open on Sunday and Monday to make sure we will be able to see things on those days.

For Mexico, I can arrive at 9pm on Friday night and leave Monday at 2pm which would give us a bit more time. Both flights for me are coming out to ~ $400.

Do you want to take a look at flight timings and prices and see if one option makes much more sense for you?

Hey,

Sorry for my delayed response.

All your ideas sound very appealing ;) Although I've been in the Upstate New York many times for horse riding lessons and had an opportunity to explore Beacon and it's museum, its has a couple years ago so there might be something new to see)

But I think the most interesting for me is:

- Explore a historic town in America -- Labor day weekend would be great to explore a place like Savannah, Georgia or Charleston, South Carolina. We could explore the towns old mansions, neighborhoods, museums, have some nice meals and see something new. Both of these places would be between me and you.

I've been in Hilton Head island once long time ago but I always wanted to visit Charleston since I am a little old -fashioned;) especially in a way I see architecture, art, music, culture, lifestyle and values in 1920-s to 1960-s as opposed to now...

I like Idea of Mexico as it one of the countries in my traveling list of places I want to visit but I think there is no rush and if it meant to be we will have an opportunity to visit it another time and you will have a chance to impress me with your Spanish;)haha Anyway, let me know what you think yourself and what idea would you prefer the most because its not just about me and my preference but us and your disposition ;)
