Visually weightless design. | Share with friends, Get \$20 | View this email in your browser

In the late 19th century, architects grew tired of the building models and designs that were popular at that time. They pushed away from ornamentation and eclectic decorative features, and instead, strove to create structures based on their functions. Other influences played into these new building plans, like the rapidly industrializing society and the introduction of new construction technologies which focused on materials like glass, iron, concrete, and steel.

The result? Straight-lined rectangular forms, open-concept floor plans, and taut plane surfaces. A weightless feel was also created through the use of cantilever construction and the prominence of glass and steel as building materials. Inspired by this design ethos, we found furniture and décor that followed the same principles. This international style of architecture channeled the modern belief that form follows function, and redefined buildings as simple structures that could be both economical and beautiful.
